Jordan Caselberry: Jordan says- Learning is something that a person will never stop doing as they live on Earth. Whether it's in the classroom or in the real world, there is always knowledge to be gained. During my junior year, I participated in Lake County PADS, an organization that provides for the homeless. Once a month, I would go set up cots and serve meals to those in need. Seeing so many people that were suffering from such unfortunate situations right in my community really opened my eyes to how much people all over the world can struggle. When I go off to Butler University next year, I will continue to learn. There is a lot going on around the planet, and hopefully I'm taught about what's happening, and the struggles that other may have. I want to take what I learn from college, and use it in my career to help people. I'm not sure what exact major I'm going to enter into, but I see myself in the business field. Whatever major I enter into I still want to give back.

Malachi Hadaway: Malachi says- I think what I loved most about these activities is that I simply set out to experience more. I mean, I am by no means an aggressive guy, but I stuck with wrestling for four years and enjoyed it. I learned what it meant to persevere, to work as a part of a team, to push the limits of my body--so much. Wrestling was not unique. ALL my activities taught me something. There is just an insurmountable something about doing. That is why I am planning on taking a gap year. While I do think schooling is essential, I believe that the interactive is just as important, My goal for this gap year is to learn what it is I want to study and one day become by doing the things I love and seeing which I enjoy doing the most. I have walked through just about every open door I could find and now I feel as though there are too many choices and lives I could live. This gap year will be me figuring out who I am and what God has created me to be.
